TOP NEWS

September CIPS Volunteer of the Month: Drew Parker Ph.D., I.S.P., ITCP

CIPS

CIPS has afforded me some interesting networking opportunities over the years, and has been a good source of industry practice information. I am a believer that one should show students actions as much as tell them about important activities.

VW software puts all IT under suspicion

IT World Canada

Volkswagen has done the whole IT profession a disservice. The software in their cars has recently been found to give false results when authorities tested the car for emissions. The software changed the engine tuning when there was a test going on. There are cries demanding that the proprietary software be inspected (apparently this is already required of elevator software). The public has now learned that software is not to be trusted. READ MORE

Featured Whitepaper: 'When It Makes Sense to Move to Desktop Virtualization: Seven Key Indicators'

CIPS via IT World Canada

Download this white paper to uncover the seven signs that your organization is ready to move to VDI including: your users are bringing their own devices to work and need remote access to your data and applications; you have security concerns; you require a common desktop environment for your users; you need to meet compliance requirements; you want your IT environment to have agility and business continuity; easy desktop management and upgrades is a must; or your workforce is made up of both employees and contractors. CIOs describe the 'perfect storms' that drove them to cloud computing

IT World Canada

The potential benefits of cloud computing have been debated in Canada and elsewhere for years now, but a panel of IT leaders speaking at Microsoft's Virtual CIO Summit recently suggested they only started making the move when they felt they had no other choice. After years of offering primarily on-premise products and services, Microsoft, Oracle and many other companies have been aggressively rolling out cloud-based alternatives and opening up local data centres.
